The Underground Man then points out that some people love things which are not to their best advantage. Many people, for example, need to suffer and are ennobled by suffering; yet, the scientist and the rationalist want to remove suffering from their utopian society, thereby removing something that man passionately desires.

Notes from Underground

There in its nasty, stinking, underground home our insulted, crushed and ridiculed mouse promptly becomes absorbed in cold, malignant and, above all, everlasting spite. For forty years together it will remember its injury down to the smallest, most ignominious details, and every time will add, of itself, details still more ignominious, spitefully teasing and tormenting itself with its own imagination.

Notes from Underground: Motifs | SparkNotes

Notes from Underground is an 1864 novel by Fyodor Dostoevsky, and is considered by many to be one of the first existentialist novels. It presents itself as an excerpt from the rambling memoirs of a bitter, isolated, unnamed narrator, who is a retired civil servant living in St. Petersburg. The first part of the story is told in monologue form through the Underground Man's diary, and attacks contemporary Russian philosophy, especially Nikolay Chernyshevsky's What Is to Be Done?. The second part o

Notes from Underground - Wikipedia

The underground man does not have a high opinion of humans, seeing them as simple creatures. He claims that the violence of human history bears out his theory of mankind's essential irrationality. He believes that he is not the only one who struggles against reason by committing repulsive acts, but rather that he is representative of a general human tendency to do so.

The underground man speaks of people who believe that humans only do bad things because they don't know their "true interest" and that if people knew what was in their best interest they would only act accordingly. The underground man disagrees and says that sometimes man desires "something harmful to himself."
